LETTER FROM THE EDITOR

In this issue, readers will notice an article about a specific ancestral family. Because of limited appeal, such articles are not usually printed, but this one demonstrates methodology for extending your ancestral line. Hopefully, you will see how you can apply these techniques to your own research, and even more hopefully, researchers will be encouraged to tackle the records of France. Background information and summaries of the families' lives are as seen by the writer. Please be aware that this is not a "Baron of Montfort" type of article, but one that reflects solid research methodology and sources.

Upcoming events were described in the previous "Letter," and will be repeated here. The 1993 NGS Conference in the States to be held in Baltimore June 2-5 may be history by the time you receive this issue. If you missed it, start making plans for next year's Conference to be held in Houston, Texas. Details will be in future issues, and other periodicals.

Gene-A-Rama, the annual conference of the Wisconsin Genealogical Council, will be held in Sparta, WI June 18-19, 1993. Roger Joslyn, C.G., F.A.S.G. is the featured speaker on topics which include New York and Pennsylvania research, publishing your genealogy, and 19th Century passenger arrival lists and naturalization records. There will be a computer lab and several computer programs as door prizes. If you need further information write WGC, %Emil Krause, 6083 County Trunk S., Wisconsin Rapids, WI 54494 or phone Carolyn Habelman or myself.

The Federation of Genealogical Societies and the Missouri State Genealogical Association are hosts for A Conference for the Nation's Genealogists in St. Louis, Missouri to be held August 5-7, 1993 in St. Louis. For more information write FGS 1993 Conference in St. Louis, P.O. Box 3385, Salt Lake City, UT 84110-3385. The program is ready and will be sent to you with a registration packet.

The Great Lakes Experience program committee has begun work and a program should be available in August. This conference will be held August 4-6, 1994 at Fort Wayne, Indiana. Everyone who attended the FGS' An All-American Conference held there in 1991 knows the fine meeting facilities and opportunities for research in the Allen County Public Library. If you missed it, here's a second chance.

An Index to NGS and FGS Conferences and Syllabi, Joy Reisinger CGRS, compiler, is jointly published by both organizations and should be available by conference time in Baltimore. To quote the "Foreword" by Eric Grundset, "Joy . . . began work on an index to the publications (the programs and syllabi) for the annual conferences of the National Genealogical Society and the Federation of Genealogical Societies which have been held since 1979. Her purpose was to provide future conference planners with a guide to all past conference lectures and speakers, thereby enabling them to identify specialties, trends and other developments in genealogical education in the conference setting." As stated in my "Preface," "This reference work is a guide to lectures, lecturers, and audio tape availability. It is intended not only to assist conference and seminar planners, but genealogical researchers as well. Presentations are cited in bibliographies, often because this handout is the only comprehensive published account of a particular research technique. Although not all syllabus materials are created equal, many have been painstakingly and carefully prepared. This shared expertise then becomes valuable as a reference tool. "Syllabi are on the shelves of many libraries and this index should make the contents more easily found. Because syllabi from long-past conferences were printed in very limited quantities, some have become scarce. One facility that has them is the Monroe County Local History Room in Sparta, Wisconsin. Requests for copies of handouts may be sent to them at the Courthouse Annex, Sparta, WI 54656. The fee is $3.00 per handout requested plus #10 SASE. Checks should be made to Reproductions." More detailed instructions are given, along with the notice, "Any lecturer who does not wish to have her or his handout material duplicated is asked to please drop a note to that effect to the History Room." Royalties will be sent once a year to those speakers who can be located.

The book is soft-bound, 8 1/2" x 11", xii + 175 pp., $15.00 plus shipping and handling. Both organizations are offering member discounts. Write to NGS at 4527 Seventeenth Street North, Arlington, VA 22207-2399 or FGS at P.O. Box 3385, Salt Lake City, UT 84110-3385.

Good Hunting!
The Family Secrets of the Le Neuf Origins in France
John P. DuLong, Ph.D.

Historians and genealogists have accepted the noble origins of the Canadian Le Neuf family in France without adequate genealogical proof. The Le Neufs in France claimed nobility that reaches back to the fourteenth century. The founder of the family was supposedly Raoul Le Neuf who migrated from England to France. However, the King of France’s own genealogist, Louis-Pierre d’Hozier, was skeptical of this claim and only accepted their pedigree from Richard Le Neuf, sieur de Vaucongrin who flourished in the mid-fifteenth century. The published pedigree in the Armorial général de France is elaborate and extends from the fifteenth century up to the mid-eighteenth. However, none of the known documents or publications indicate how the Canadian Le Neufs are related to their illustrious French kinsmen.

In 1675 Jacques Le Neuf, sieur de La Poterie, voluntarily submitted his proofs of nobility to the Sovereign Council of New France. Although the evidence he submitted was legally sufficient for the Sovereign Council to recognize his claim to nobility, it is inadequate for genealogical purposes since it fails to document his ancestry. The testimony of his Le Neuf kinsmen back in France explicitly states that the Canadian Le Neufs are "...of the same family and carry the same name and arms..." However, this testimony does not state the exact relationship between Jacques Le Neuf and his French kinsmen. The modern family researcher must ponder why Jacques Le Neuf failed to provide a detailed pedigree of his descent from Richard Le Neuf. This is especially frustrating when other associated Canadian families, such as the Le Gardeurs, provided clearly documented pedigrees as proof of their nobility.

I believe that the Canadian Le Neufs were trying to conceal two family secrets and that this explains why their nobility proofs are a genealogical failure. The first secret is that back in France they were Huguenots. In New France they had to keep their religious preference hidden in the all-Catholic colony. The second secret is that the Canadian branch of the Le Neuf family while in France had... experienced derogation of their noble status. The immediate ancestors of the Canadian Le Neufs, though related to established noble cousins, had gradually drifted into the bourgeoisie and had lost their standing as nobles.

This paper will do the following: (1) review and summarize the pertinent facts about the Le Neufs who came to Canada; (2) document their origins in Normandy; (3) prove their Huguenot background; and (4) deal with their derogation as nobles.

The Known Facts

The first two noble families to settle permanently in New France were the Le Neufs and Le Gardeurs. They were led by Jacques Le Neuf, sieur de La Poterie, and his brother-in-law, Pierre Le Gardeur, sieur de Repentigny. Accompanying La Poterie was his mother Jeanne Le Marchant, the widow of Mathieu Le Neuf, sieur du Hérisson, his brother Michel Le Neuf, sieur du Hérisson, his sister Marie Le Neuf, and their dependents. The party of Pierre Le Gardeur consisted of his mother Catherine de Cordé, the widow of René Le Gardeur, sieur de Tilly, his brother Charles Le Gardeur, sieur de Tilly, his sister Marie-Marguerite Le Gardeur, and their spouses and children. The families were united through the marriage of a La Poterie to Marie-Marguerite Le Gardeur. In addition, the Le Neufs and Le Gardeurs brought approximately forty settlers with them.

The ship that had carried the Le Gardeur and Le Neuf families was part of a fleet of eight vessels which escorted Charles Huault de Montmagny, the newly appointed governor, to New France. In this same fleet were several missionaries including Father Isaac Jogues, the future Jesuit martyr. The fleet left from the harbor of Dieppe, in Normandy, on 8 April 1636. On the 11 June 1636 they arrived at Quebec City after a ten week voyage.

Father Paul Le Jeune, the superior of the Jesuits in New France, heralded their arrival as a great event. He referred to Pierre Le Gardeur and La Poterie as "gallant Gentlemen" who have come to Canada with settlers to stay. He continued to say:

... I leave you to imagine if joy did not take possession of our hearts, and surprise of our minds... All of this was doubled in their presence; their elegance, their conversation showed us the great difference there is between our French and our Savages.

The reasons behind the Le Neufs' decision to migrate are unknown. However, a contributing factor must have been the desire for land. On 16 April 1647 the Company of New France confirmed the title of the seigneury of Portneuf to La Poterie. The Company had originally given him the land on 15 January 1636 but had neglected to issue a title of concession until eleven years later. Portneuf is on

7. For the sake of clarity, I will usually refer to Jacques Le Neuf as La Poterie and his brother Michel Le Neuf as Du Hérisson. This will avoid confusion when we have to deal with their similarly named Le Neuf kinsmen back in France. Besides, their contemporaries usually referred to them only by these aliases.
8. The Jesuit Superior, Le Jeune, claimed that they arrived with forty-five people including six damsels. This number must include some of the Le Neuf and Le Gardeur family members. the north side of the St. Lawrence River between Québec and Trois-Rivières. Soon after their arrival the Le Neufs settled in Trois-Rivières and the Le Gardeurs in Québec. On 12 December 1636, at Trois-Rivières, Du Hérisson and his sister Marie were the godparents at the baptism of an Algonquin girl.14

The Le Neufs and the Le Gardeurs soon became crucial players in the colony's affairs and assumed important roles in business and government. According to the historian Benjamin Suite, they became the "family pact" when they were joined in marriage with the Godeffoy and Robineau families.15 The descendants of this family pact became the core of the Canadian elite and they held several important posts in Canada, Acadia, Louisiana, and the Caribbean. The Le Neufs and the Le Gardeurs were the start of the Canadian noblesse. Until the intendency of Jean Talon in 1667, when more nobles came over and the King ennobled several French-Canadians, the Le Neufs and the Le Gardeurs were the two leading resident noble families in Canada.16

From the day of their landing the Le Neufs led people to understand that they were nobles. No one mistook them for the higher nobility. After all it was unlikely that members of the court nobility would come to the wilderness of New France as settlers. However, contemporary observers easily saw them as part of the lower Norman nobility. The few important court nobles who did come over to Canada came with official positions and titles and only remained for the tenure of their office or died in the position. In contrast, the Le Neufs came to stay. No one hints that they were less than what they appeared to be. Le Jeune's comments clearly gives the reader the impression that an important set of Catholic nobles had arrived to settle in New France. There is no mention made of any religious peculiarities on the part of the Le Neufs by Le Jeune or their fellow passengers. If the religious authorities had known of the Huguenot preferences of the Le Neufs, then it is very unlikely that they would have neglected to comment on it. The logical conclusion is that by 1636 the Le Neufs had decided to either abandon their reformed faith or to conceal it. Because Du Hérisson and Marie Le Neuf acted as godparents at the baptism of an Indian child it is evident that they were not living openly as Huguenots. Eventually, the Catholic hierarchy in Canada would have less than kind things to say about the Le Neufs. However, they never attacked them as Huguenots. They arrived in Canada with their family secrets intact. Only their in-laws and neighbors back in France, the Le Gardeurs, could have known about their background.

Although the Le Neufs claimed to be nobles from the moment of their arrival, their behavior resembled that of the stereotypical money-hungry bourgeois. They seemed to be unaware of the principle of noblesse oblige and were not fond of the noble tradition of military service. They avoided as much as possible the acceptance of military responsibilities during the 1651-1652 Iroquois raids which devastated the area around Trois-Rivières. The local habitants did not hold them in esteem. In fact, the Le Neufs came to rule the town of Trois-Rivières in a dictatorial fashion.17 They became active in the disreputable side of the fur trade and sold brandy to the Indians. They did nothing for the 16. Talon reported only four noble families in Canada, but he does not name them. According to Parkman, Talon supposedly was referring to Repentigny, Tilly, Poterie, and Ailleboust, but, unbeknownst to Parkman, the first two are really Le Gardeurs. Francis Parkman, The Old Régime in Canada, reprinted in France and England in North America, 2 vols. (New York: Library of America, 1983), vol. 1, pp. 1282. This over simplifies the Canadian noblesse. We know that René Robineau was living in Canada by 1645, see Trudel, Immigrants, p. 157. Also, by 1663 there were at least eighteen noble families living in Canada, see Marcel Trudel, La Population du Canada en 1663 (Montréal: Fides, 1973), pp. 120-131.

by way of exploration or encouraging settlement. They consistently used the public offices they sought for their favor in their own business interests. They had a disrespect for other office holders and their rulings. They often ignored the court system when they were unable to control it. Their relations with the Catholic Church, especially the Jesuit missionaries, was far from ideal. In short they had a well developed seventeenth century business sense. Douville calls them "clever Norman merchants." Lamontagne says of La Poterie that "He was a wily business man who often had brushes with the law."19

In this particular case, I believe that the Le Neufs' rapid assumption of business behavior and values, especially in regard to the fur trade, supports the other facts indicating their bourgeois background.20

According to the available evidence Jeanne Le Marchant, the mother of the Canadian Le Neufs, was the widow of Mathieu Le Neuf, sieur du Hérisson.21 Previous researchers had learned little about her birth and parentage. They only knew that she came to New France with her children. She settled at Trois-Rivières and appeared in the parish register several times until 1647. The date and place of her death and burial is unknown though she undoubtedly died in New France. Researchers knew from the marriage of their daughter that her husband was already dead by 1622. Mathieu probably died near Caen or Thury-Harcourt where the family had been living. There was no evidence uncovered to indicate his parentage.

Michel Le Neuf, sieur du Hérisson, was their eldest son.22 He was born around 1601 probably near Caen. His marital status is unclear. However, he did have a daughter named Anne who married Antoine Desrosiers in 1647 at Trois-Rivières. Both historians and genealogists have carefully noted that her exact relationship to Du Hérisson is undocumented. Some call her his daughter, others his illegitimate daughter, and a few suggest that she was his adopted daughter.23 Her origins are another family secret that has yet to be revealed. Du Hérisson was active in the fur trade. He was a co-founder of the Community of Habitants fur-trading company in 1645. From 1661 to 1662 and from 1664 to 1672 he was a lieutenant general of the civil and criminal court. He held the seigneuries of Vieuxpons near Trois-Rivières and the fief of Dutort near Bécancour. He died before 26 October 1672 at Trois-Rivières. The exact place and date of his burial is unknown. He never married in Canada and his descendants are through his daughter Anne.

Jacques Le Neuf, sieur de La Poterie, was the second son.24 He was born around 1606 near Caen. He married Marie-Marguerite Le Gardeur around 1630 probably in her village of Thury-Harcourt. Like his brother, he was active in the fur trade and one of the co-founders of the Community

20. I realize it is not fashionable to editorialize about our ancestors. However, except for their presumed noble pedigree and adventurous spirit, there is little in the character of the Le Neufs to recommend them to their descendants. I find them repulsive in many ways. And yet, I am in the awkward position of being their descendant and being fascinated with their lineage and even in their less than honorable character. Needless to say, we do not have to like our ancestors or approve of their ways to do genealogical research on them. Furthermore, there is no guarantee that our ancestors would approve of us and our modern enlightened ways.

of Habitants. He was the governor of Trois-Rivières off and on from 1645 to 1662. Besides being the seigneur of Portneuf since 1636, he was also the owner of Ile-aux-Cochons granted in 1649, and of La Poterie (or Niverville) granted in 1660, both near Trois-Rivières.25 Lastly, he had a joint interest with Charles Le Gardeur and others in a seigneury called Cap-des-Rosiers in Gaspé.

La Poterie and Marguerite had two daughters and a son: Marie-Anne the wife of René Robineau, sieur de Bécancour, chevalier in the Order of St. Michel, and Baron de Portneuf;26 Catherine the wife of Pierre Denys, sieur de La Ronde; and Michel Le Neuf, sieur de La Vallière, who became the governor of Acadia.

La Poterie almost became the governor of New France. The ailing Governor Augustin de Saffray de Mézy, a fellow Norman, from Caen, appointed La Poterie to succeed him in case of death.27
Saffray died on 6 May 1665. La Poterie registered his commission to act as governor on 13 May.
However, the Sovereign Council denied him the full powers of the governorship on 27 May. They argued that only the King had a right to appoint a governor and that Saffray was out of line in commissioning La Poterie. His own brother-in-law on the Sovereign Council, Charles Le Gardeur, voted against La Poterie assuming the full powers of governor. He continued to act as intermediate governor of New France but only with limited power over the militia until 12 September 1665. On 18
October 1666, perhaps chagrined by his treatment, La Poterie travelled aboard the Moulin d'Or first to Acadia and then back to France on family business.28 While in France, he may have gathered some of the information he submitted in 1675 to prove his nobility.

La Poterie returned to New France before 22 May 1668. Like his mother and brother, the place and date of La Poterie's death is unknown. He died after 4 November 1687 probably around Québec.29

Marie Le Neuf was the eldest daughter. She married Jean Godefroy, sieur de Linctot, a fellow Norman in Québec. Her marriage contract was drawn up on 15 December 1636 at Trois-Rivières. No religious record of their marriage has been found. However, this is not surprising since the parish register of Trois-Rivières does not record any marriages until 1654. Nevertheless, the Catholic Church is referred to twice in the document so it is very likely that the wedding took place before a priest. This contract has a clause revealing important information about the origins of the Le Neufs.30 It states that the sieur du Colombier, her brother-in-law back in France, is to send her 1,800 livres after the consummation of the marriage. This sum was accorded to her in an act passed before the tabellions of Thury-Harcourt.31 This means that the Canadian Le Neufs had made financial arrangements in France before their departure with tabellions back in Thury-Harcourt. Her mother and brother Du Hérisson both signed the contract.

25. La Poterie might also have been the seigneur of the Marquisate de Sablé. Despite its exotic name, the Marquisate was not a titled property. It never conferred the title of marquis on any of its owners. There is also some doubt if it ever truly
26. La Poterie ceded the seigneurie of Portneuf to his son-in-law in 1671 and it was elevated to a barony in 1681. See Jetté, Dictionnaire généalogique, pp. 713 and 998.
29. Douville, "Dictature," p. 86, suggests that La Poterie may have died in Acadia while visiting his son Michel Le Neuf, sieur de la Vallière, the governor of the colony. However, he admits to having no proof to back this supposition.
30. For a transcription of this contract see Suite, "Godefroy," vol. 11, pp. 15-17.
31. Tabellions were scribes who could draw up legal contracts and sign them but they had to register them with a notary.
The last known member of the family is the youngest daughter who remained behind in Normandy. Madeleine was the wife of Jean Le Poutrel, sieur des Coulombiers. She had married him on 24 November 1622 at the parish of St-Jean in Caen. The Le Poutrel family had ties to the village of Argences west of Caen. They eventually settled in Thury-Harcourt and Jean died there after 22 July 1648. Madeleine and Jean appear to have been Catholics since their children were baptized at St-Jean in Caen or at St-Patrice in Argences. Although they did not come to Canada, three of their children did settle in New France: François at Montréal; Guy, sieur de Bellecourt, at Trois-Rivières; and Marie-Madeleine who became a Catholic nun and was known as Mère de St-Michel at the Hôtel-Dieu, Québec.

Although several documents claim that the Le Neufs were from Caen, the best available evidence suggest that their final ties in France were to the neighboring village of Thury-Harcourt. Their sister Madeleine was living there with her husband, their sister Marie had legal ties to tabellions there, and La Poterie's in-laws were from the village. The data also shows that Madeleine was living as a Catholic and that Marie married within the Church. Again this reinforces the idea that by 1636 the Le Neufs were living as Catholics or at least hiding their beliefs both in Canada and in France. The fact that a niece becomes a nun shows that at least one member of the family was sincerely Catholic.

It is ironic that although many Canadian noble families are related in some way to the Le Neuf family, none of the Le Neufs left descendants of their surname in Canada. The Le Neufs eventually became important colonial officials and returned to France with the conquest of Quebec. Their descendants in Canada trace their descent through daughters. Some of the related families in the first few generations carry the following surnames: Godefroy, Desrosiers, Le Gardeur, de Villieu, Bertrand, de Gannes, Aubert, and Robineau. With these illustrious names from Canadian history associated with them it becomes clear that the Le Neufs made an important contribution to the elite of New France.

To summarize, the available genealogical data fails to identify the parents of Mathieu Le Neuf and his wife Jeanne Le Marchant. Several clues point to a specific area of Normandy for further research.

Difficulties in Tracing the Le Neuf Origins in France

The Canadian Le Neufs came from the town of Caen or the nearby village of Thury-Harcourt just sixteen miles south. Both towns were in the diocese of Bayeux, in the former province of Normandy, and are now in the department of Calvados. They are on the Orne River in the fertile plane of Lower Normandy. In the seventeenth century Caen was the second city of Normandy and next to Rouen in importance. It had a fairly large university but was not the scene of the provincial parlement or of the diocese. It had a mix of agriculturally related industries such as leather tanning and textile manufacturing. Significantly, Caen was the center of the Protestant movement in Normandy.

33. Godbout, Pionniers, p. 29, suggests that Gaspard le Poutrel may also have been their child and may have settled at Trois-Rivières.
34. Thwaites, Jesuit Relations, vol. 8, p. 310, fn. 58. Thwaites says that according to Suite the Le Neuf surname became extinct in Canada after the Conquest.
Approximately one-half to three-quarters of its citizens were Huguenot in the mid-sixteenth century. Even after several decades of persecution about one-quarter were still Huguenot in the 1590's.\(^{36}\)

Caen overshadowed neighboring villages including Thury-Harcourt. Apparently, many bourgeois living in these neighboring villages kept a tie to Caen. They did so to be known as bourgeois de Caen and thereby take advantage of certain tax breaks.\(^{37}\)

Most of the records of genealogical interest for both Caen and Thury-Harcourt should be in the Departmental Archives of Calvados at Caen. Regrettably, the Invasion of Normandy bombings in June 1944 destroyed many of the departmental records in this archives when the Allies had to bomb the city to eject the Nazi occupiers. Although some records escaped destruction, the bombing ruined the Catholic parish registers for the sixteenth and much of the seventeenth centuries; however, the notarial and tabellionnage records have survived.\(^{38}\)

Archmage Godbout, the famous French-Canadian genealogist, had the opportunity to view the records of Caen during the 1920's on his genealogical sweep through France. Other than finding some mention of the Le Poutrels, he found nothing of interest for the Le Neufs.\(^{39}\)

Important New Findings

A search of the notarial records of Thury-Harcourt for clues about the Le Neufs turned up a crucial document dated 11 July 1619. This states in part that "... Jehanne Le Marchant, widow of Mathieu Le Neuf, sieur du Hérisson..." is the guardian of her underage children. Also, "... the Reformed Church of the said Caen..." This information shows that Mathieu Le Neuf was dead by 1619 and that Jeanne Le Marchant was connected to the Huguenot church.\(^{40}\) and de la Rocque lieutenant of Monsieur le bailly of Concé-sur-Noireau and the lady Venote de St-Germain her mother and father of the parish and town of the said Concé of the second part have been witnessed without impeachment.

This document presents us with the parents of Mathieu Le Neuf and Jeanne Le Marchant. Unfortunately, it does not tie the Jean Le Neuf mentioned here to the known published lineages. Nevertheless, this marriage information provides important clues about the background of the family. It helps to explain why La Poterie provided such weak genealogical evidence of his nobility, and it definitely shows that the Le Neufs were Huguenots. Furthermore, the document refers to the Le Neufs as bourgeois and not as nobles.

Although they were married at Caen, the groom and bride were from nearby rural parishes. According to Lamet, it was not uncommon for Huguenots of surrounding towns to marry at Caen. Condé-sur-Noireau, about 12 miles south of Thury-Harcourt, is a place not previously connected to the family. It was one of the seven rural centers of Huguenots in the nearby Colloque de Falaise. The marriage promise also shows that the Le Neufs were a geographically mobile family with ties to Caen and Thury-Harcourt. Moreover, there is a location called La Pottie near this place. This might be the place where Jacques Le Neuf acquired his title sieur de la Poterie. Another intriguing clue shows that the Le Neufs were already tied to the Le Gardeurs through Jean Le Neuf's marriage to Marguerite Le Gardeur. Her relationship to her grandson La Poterie's wife has yet to be determined.

Also in the Huguenot parish register are the following documents:
The said day and Sunday 22 of June [1603] the son of Mathieu Le Neuf and of Jenne [Jeanne] Le Marchant his wife of the quarter of St-Jan [St-Jean] has been baptized by me Jan Le Bouvier minister of the word of God . . . known and named Josué by Jn [Jean] Le Neuf of the said quarter.

42. Although the surname Le Neuf does not appear in Lart's published portion of the Protestant register of Caen, the surnames Poutrel, Marchant, and St-Germain do appear in the early records, Lart, Register, passim. Cazin has also found evidence that some of the Le Gardeurs in France were Huguenots, Jeanne Marie Cazin to John P. DuLong, 16 June 1990.

This La Pottie is in the commune of Vassy, about 3.5 miles west of Condé-sur-Noireau. Although there are several locations called Hérisson in France, none of them are near Caen or in Calvados, Ibid., vol. 3, pp. 1874-1875. The definitive location of Hérisson, as well as La Pottie, has yet to be proven.
We now have the Protestant baptismal records of three children for Mathieu Le Neuf and Jeanne Le Marchant. Josué is a child previously unknown, but the baptisms of Jacques and Magdaléne fit in with what is known about La Poterie and his sister Madeleine. No record of the baptism of Du Hérisson around 1601 was found.

The Huguenot parish register is missing information for several crucial years. For example, there are no baptismal records for the period around Anne Le Neuf's birth in 1631 and there are no marriage records between 1614 and 1642 when La Poterie would have married Marguerite Le Gardeur. The baptismal records, as microfilmed by the Genealogical Society of Utah, end in 1607.

The Huguenot's Need for Secrecy

In our age of relative religious tolerance and egalitarianism it is difficult for us to understand why the Le Neufs found it necessary to hide from their past. We must look at what it meant to be a Huguenot in France and in Canada during the seventeenth century.

Although Henry IV issued the Edict of Nantes proclaiming toleration in 1598, the France of Louis XIII was not kind to Protestants. Cardinal Richelieu, the King’s minister, crushed the Huguenot uprising at La Rochelle in 1626. In the following year the Cardinal forbade Huguenots to settle in Canada, a decision strongly supported by the Jesuits. Although the serious persecution of the Huguenots did not start until the reign of Louis XIV, even in Richelieu’s age it was better for a career at court to be a Catholic than a Protestant. With the revocation of the act of tolerance in 1685 this became mandatory. However, even before that time, as early as 1679, many Huguenots found it advantageous or necessary to hide their true beliefs. Although some Huguenots did move to the colony and practiced their faith in secret, most of these hidden Huguenots eventually had to abjure to survive, to avoid burial in unsanctified ground, to marry, or to have children baptized and recognized as legitimate. Eventually, they lost their children or grandchildren to the Catholic faith.

We will probably never know to what extent the Le Neufs were still attached to their Protestant beliefs when they arrived in Canada. At the minimum, they must have gone through the motions of being Catholics as no contemporaries mention any heresy on their part. They must have attended Mass regularly during their lives to avoid gossip. It may in fact be that by the time they settled in New France they had willingly returned to the Catholic faith. Certainly, they appeared as godparents at Catholic baptisms. Curiously though, the burials for La Poterie and Du Hérisson, as well as their mother, have never been found. Is it just because these acts were not recorded and preserved, or was it a final defiance of the Church they had to follow in life but not in death? Certainly, the burials of less eminent settlers are recorded for the same period.

The evidence that the Le Neufs were once Huguenots in France is clear. That they remained so in New France is circumstantial at best since there are no contemporary accounts accusing them of Protestant leanings. However, the Le Neufs objected to many Catholic policies and privileges in the colony. For instance, they were heavily involved in the ecclesiastically condemned brandy trade with the Indians. They seemed to have taken a relish in engaging the Church in controversy. They also had a penchant for squabbling over land with the Jesuits. They definitely exhibited an anti-Church bias.

48. Lamet discusses various strategies Huguenots used in reaction to persecution in Caen. Among their options were abjuration and exile. They often returned to their religious beliefs once the persecution ended. Lamet, “Caen,” chap. 8, pp. 383-440.
Douville stated that: "The relations of the Le Neufs with religious authority never seemed to have been the most cordial." Nevertheless, we must be careful not to misinterpret their anti-Church behavior as a result of their supposed religious views. The Le Neufs need not necessarily be Huguenots to disagree with Church policy. After all, there were many good Catholics using brandy in the fur trade who also ran into these same difficulties with the Church. Furthermore, the Le Neufs' dislike of the Jesuits was not uncommon among Catholics. Even in their native Caen both the Huguenots and the Catholics banded together in 1608 to object to the introduction of the Jesuit order in the city.

Unavoidably, the family inevitably drifted into the Catholic fold. A niece became a nun at the Hôtel-Dieu and the Le Neuf children and grandchildren appear to be completely Catholic. The Le Neufs in order to maintain their position and excel in New France had to acquiesce to the Church. Slowly through the generations they became Catholic if they were not already at the time of their arrival.

In the sixteenth century the French fought a civil war over religion. Like any civil war, families divided on issues and segments drifted back and forth on the changing fortunes of the war. The Le Neufs were caught in the bind between what they wanted to believe and what they found necessary to believe.

La Poterie could not submit genealogical proofs of his noble lineage without the records showing that his family had once been Huguenots. He decided to take the safer course and have two kinsmen whose religious beliefs were not in doubt - one was a priest - to testify that he was a member of the family. Thus he avoided the whole religious issue. He also kept the derogation of his branch of the family from noble to bourgeois status hidden as well.

The Embarrassment of Derogation

In France and New France to be a member of the noble class was important for social and economic reasons. It meant a certain level of social status and freedom from a whole array of taxes. Therefore, to pretend you were a noble was to be a tax fraud. The Court of Aids, responsible for judging disputes relating to tax collection, investigated these cases for the royal government. This court made every effort to catch these pretend nobles. They regularly carried on special investigations into nobility claims of the local gentry. During these investigations nobles were required to submit proof of their own nobility and that of their ancestors for several generations. In addition, they had to demonstrate that they were maintaining a noble lifestyle and were not engaged in bourgeois trade or peasant labor.

Derogation meant that a person of noble ancestry was no longer living as a noble. The cause for the loss of noble status and privileges depended on the laws of each French province. In general, it was lost if a noble engaged in unapproved forms of business. According to the historian Roland Mousnier, not all forms of business were forbidden to nobles. Wholesale trade and shipping were allowed as were mining or anything else that developed a noble's own land. Wholesale trade was especially allowed in the customary laws of Brittany and Normandy. However, simple retail trade would endanger a person's noble status. If a person became involved in retail trade, became a simple bourgeois, then he would lose his noble status and be liable to pay taxes.

It is unclear if a degraded noble could easily regain his noble status. Mousnier, claims that noblesse de race never lost their noble status even if they engaged in a degrading trade, nor did their children. For the lower levels of the nobility, rehabilitation was possible but problematic. If their father had misguided engaged in trade, then the children could obtain a letter of rehabilitation from the King. The courts would reinvestigate their nobility claims to make sure they were rehabilitated. For the recently ennobled, the rehabilitation was probably not as easy since they had only just left the ranks of the bourgeoisie one or two generations ago. Although gaining a letter of rehabilitation was a possibility, avoiding the taint of bourgeois life style would be far easier. To be derogated was not only an embarrassment, it was a liability in a status oriented hierarchial society such as France during the ancien régime.

The Court of Aids periodically conducted recherche de la noblesse to catch fraudulent and derogated nobles. Those caught were subject to fines and taxes. In fact, the royal government often used these investigations to raise funds through the extortion of recently ennobled to pay for recognition. The recently ennobled always held on tentatively to their status until several generations confirmed it by living as nobles. The most ambitious investigations were during the reign of Louis XIV to raise money for his ceaseless wars. These investigations also had an impact on New France where the nobles were asked to register their proofs of noble ancestry with the Sovereign Council of the colony.

Several times in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries various members of the Le Neuf family were investigated and had to prove their noble status. Several members of the French Le Neuf family were maintained as nobles. That is, they were able to provide adequate proof to an investigator of the Court of Aids that they, and their ancestors, were nobles. La Poterie registered his proofs of nobility on 24 September 1675 in Québec for the consideration of the Sovereign Council. He submitted for his proofs of nobility data that his kinsman collected in response to an investigation. This relative was Jacques Le Neuf, esquire, councilor and procurator of His Majesty in the royal jurisdiction of Havre de Grace. This French Jacques Le Neuf was accused of usurpation on 15 March 1658. The State Council of the King recognized him as a noble on 4 December 1659. Although the proofs that the French

54. In New France, nobles could engage more readily in business, especially the fur trade, without derogation. It was considered respectable along with maritime-related activities. Francis Parkman, Old Régime, vol. 1, pp. 1285-1286.
55. Mousnier, Institutions of France, vol. 1, pp. 131-132. In France the nobility was divided hierarchically into several types. From top to bottom the ranking was roughly the royal blood princes, the ancient families of the race (peers), the nobles of the sword (military nobles), and the nobles of the robe (judicial and administrative nobles). Many in this last category were recently ennobled. Also, titles of nobility such as duc, marquis, comte, and baron were not held by all nobles. Most nobles were known simply as chevaliers (knights) or as écuyers (squires). Lastly, it was possible to hold a seigneur and still be a commoner (a roturier). The "de" particle does not impart nobility, just possession of land. For more information about the hierarchy of nobles see Charles E. Lart, "French noblesse," The Genealogist's Magazine 7:5 (March 1936): 229-242.
57. For a partial list of investigations see Mousnier, Institutions of France, vol. 1, p. 136. All of Normandy was done in 1655. Research into titles of nobility were ordered for the whole kingdom on 20 June 1664.

Jacques Le Neuf submits clearly shows his descent from Richard Le Neuf, nowhere is it shown how La Poterie is related to him.\(^{59}\)

In addition to this evidence, La Poterie also had two kinsman swear that he was part of the family. These relatives were Pierre Le Neuf, priest, sieur de Courtonne, and his brother, François Le Neuf, esquire, sieur de Montenay. They were from the parish of St-Julien in Caen. They made a statement that La Poterie was of the same family on 5 May 1673 before the royal tabellions Ollivier and Bougon. Again, the lineage of these French brothers goes back to Richard Le Neuf and is well documented, but there is no indication of their exact relationship to La Poterie.\(^{60}\)

Mousnier lists suitable evidence that could be used to prove nobility.\(^{61}\) Someone other than the interested party had to generate the evidence. For example, it could be a marriage contract made by a notary or tabellion. Also, the person under investigation had to prove a certain number of generations back were referred to as nobles.\(^{62}\) Alternatively, the person under investigation was allowed to have witnesses confirm that his father and grandfather were nobles, that he lived like a noble, and that he did not degrade himself through engaging in business or by paying any taxes.

When La Poterie submitted his proofs of nobility in 1675 he decided to go with the approach of having witnesses claim that he was part of a noble family. He had his kinsmen, who in 1667 had been recently maintained in their nobility, swear to this effect. Furthermore, he uses the records of another kinsman’s maintenance of 1659 to bolster the prestige of the Canadian Le Neuf family claim. This documentation was barely adequate to prove nobility in the seventeenth century. Certainly, it is not genealogically sound in the twentieth century. In fact, I speculate that the Sovereign Council accepted it only because La Poterie submitted it voluntarily. It was never under the critical gaze of an investigating official. La Poterie did the minimum to prove his nobility without revealing his Huguenot background or the derogation of his noble status.

Beyond the suspicions surrounding La Poterie’s weak proofs of nobility there are also clues about his derogated background in France. Every document I have seen so far from France mentions the Canadian Le Neufs and their ancestors as bourgeois. For example, a document dated 15 December 1595 at Thury-Harcourt refers to "... honorables hommes maistres Mathieu et Michel Leneuf, frères, bourgeois de Caen ..."\(^{63}\) The phrase bourgeois de Caen must be handled with care. Both Lart and Mousnier note that a phrase such as Mathieu Le Neuf, bourgeois de Caen could refer to a nobleman who resides in a city as a freeman with important civil responsibilities. This was different from the Daigle claims without proof that the French Jacques Le Neuf was the uncle of La Poterie. The available limited evidence makes it more likely that they were distant cousins in the same generation.

60. An unclear passage in Godbout indicates that La Poterie and Du Hérisson were accused on 24 September 1666 in France of usurping nobility status and sentenced to pay 2,000 livres (Godbout, Trifluvienne, p. 19). Douville repeats this as fact (Douville, "Dictature," p. 85). However, they have confused the data. This investigation was not directed against the Canadian Le Neufs at all. Rather, it was aimed at François and Pierre Le Neuf who would later testify on the behalf of their Canadian kinsman. These brothers had their nobility maintained by an order of the King’s Council 1 October 1667. Guy Chamillart, Recherche de la Noblesse en la Généralité de Caen (Caen: Henry Delesques, 1887; reprint ed., Paris: Sedopols, 1981), p. 802.
simple phrase Mathieu Le Neuf, bourgeois, de Caen who would have been a merchant. However, this was not a strictly observed distinction. This was especially true in the case of Caen where there were tax benefits for merchants if they could prove that they were a bourgeois de Caen. It is noteworthy that Michel and Mathieu were addressed as maistres, or masters. This is a term usually reserved for men of letters and distinguished craftsmen.

Comparison of La Poterie's titles over time shows how he manufactured his social status. In a document dated 2 December 1629 at Thury-Harcourt he is referred to as "Me Jacques Le Neuf Sr de la Poterie bourgeois de Caen." On 5 May 1673 at Québec he is noted as "Jacques Leneuf, Ecuyer, sieur de la Poterie, demeurant au bourg des Trois-Rivières." Notice that he is no longer referred to as master but as esquire and that he is not a bourgeois of Trois-Rivières but a dweller of that town.

So far it is unclear in the evidence how long ago this branch of the Le Neuf family had degraded into the bourgeoisie. Further research must be done to discover what trade the family engaged in and how long they were involved in it. Nevertheless, I imagine, based on the lack of information in the d'Hozier files about them, that it was perhaps as early as the fourteenth century. Despite an ancient pedigree, none of the Le Neufs - until the eighteenth century with the creation of Le Neuf, Comte de Sourdeval - were great nobles. The French Le Neuf contemporaries of the Canadian Le Neufs are always referred to as écuyer. This was the lowest common title between all nobility in France. In this precarious position on the bottom of the nobility, I doubt if any member of the family would eagerly welcome the compliment bourgeois de Caen. Particularly, if you are trying to prove your noble status and not merely that the local townspeople admired you.

Like their Huguenot background, their bourgeois titles and accompanying life styles would have been an impediment to the progress of the Le Neufs in New France. Knowledge of these facts would have endangered their status. Therefore, it was convenient for La Poterie to have distant noble and Catholic cousins attest to his family ties rather than reveal any potentially harmful family secrets.

66. Maitre or Maistre was often abbreviated as Mtre or Me. Monsieur was usually applied to nobles. In France, Sieur or Sr was used often in legal documents to refer to merchants and craftsmen. Sieur was used much like Mister in England, as a show of respect. However, nobles and commoners also used it to indicate possession of a seigneury, for example, sieur de Bécancour.- Mousnier, Institutions of France, vol. 1, p. 9.
69. For several generations members of the d'Hozier family were the "généalogiste de la maison du roi et juge général des arms." As the King's genealogists, they collected and preserved genealogical information relating to noble titles and arms. This collection has survived as the Cabinet des Titres at the Bibliothèque nationale in Paris. There are several extensive files relating to the Le Neuf family in this collection: Ms. Fr. 32307, pp. 1088-1089; Ms. Fr. 32333, pp. 226-227 and 260-261; Ms. Fr. 28582, vol. 2098, dossier 47848; Ms. Fr. 30031, vol. 486, liasse 12749; Ms. Fr. 30693, vol. 464, ff. 51-302; Ms. Fr. 31477, vol. 252, liasse 5700; and Ms. Fr. 32247, vol. 20, Part 2, p. 626. There are also some documents abstracted from the Cabinet des Titres in the Archives nationales du Québec at the Université de Laval, cote: P-1000-64-1254. Photocopies in my possession.
Conclusion

Although the Canadian Le Neufs were less than honest about their background as derogated Huguenot nobles, there is still enough evidence to indicate that they were indeed part of the noble Le Neuf family. The Le Neufs were caught between two worlds. They were Huguenots living in a Catholic frontier settlement and derogated nobles pretending to be gentlemen but dependent on their bourgeois skills for survival. This newly revealed background calls for historians to carefully reinterpret their behavior in light of this information. Historians must still investigate the degree to which the Le Neuf family had sunk into the bourgeoisie and the extent they remained loyal to Protestantism while in Canada. Genealogists must also take these discovered facts and use them to explore other document sources—especially the notarial records of Caen—for more clues about the noble ancestors of the Canadian Le Neufs. Further historical and genealogical research should let us know even more about the hidden past of this intriguing family of Norman adventurers.
